Restructuring the Whatcom County Board of Health

Background

Under current Washington law (RCW 70.05.035)[1], the Whatcom County Council functions as the Board of Health—entirely composed of Councilmembers. In 2021, the state legislature passed HB 1152[2], requiring counties to expand health boards to include tribes and county residents with public health expertise, and allowing for the inclusion of city elected officials. As a charter county with a Public Health Advisory Board (PHAB), Whatcom County was exempt from the change. County Council retains authority to change the Board of Health structure at its discretion, and according to the specifications of RCW 70.05.035.

Rationale for Change

Across the country, most local health boards include members with public health or medical expertise. Washington began moving in this direction in response to the global pandemic. In 2022, Whatcom County Council contracted with a consulting firm to study the county's response to Covid-19. The final report[3] made several recommendations to prepare for future pandemics and disasters, including:

- Improve coordination between the county and cities
- Clarify the distinction between legislative roles (Council) and day-to-day operations (executive branch)
- Clarify the distinct responsibilities of County Council and the Board of Health
- Broaden Board of Health membership to include cities and community members with public health expertise in order to function better during emergencies and to keep the board focused on public health matters.

Role and Authorities of the Board of Health

The Board of Health is the county's policymaking body for public health, empowered by RCW[4] and county code[5]. Key authorities include:

- Adopting county-wide health regulations consistent with state law
- Enforce the Health Code through the County's Health Officer
- Establish fee schedules for issuing or renewing licenses or permits under the jurisdiction of the Health Officer
 - NOTE: according to state law, only elected officials may vote on fees
- Areas of jurisdiction include: food/restaurant inspections, on-site sewage, infectious disease, pet shop licenses, public water systems, public health emergencies, hazardous chemicals, public smoking, and several other areas of environmental health.

Work to date

In October 2024, the Whatcom County Board of Health and PHAB formed a work group to study the structure of the Board of Health. The work group reviewed peer county structures, state and national best practices, and surveyed public opinion. The work group recommendations were presented to PHAB, which voted to support the recommendations and forward them on to the Board of Health. At the April 1 Board of Health meeting the recommendations were reviewed: 1) to expand the Board of Health to include County Councilmembers, city elected officials, tribes, public health/medical professionals, and community members with lived public health experience, and 2) to continue the role of PHAB.

At the April 1 Board of Health meeting the Joint Public Health Advisory Board/Health Board Structure Working Group delivered a presentation on their study of health board structures across the state. Following the presentation the Board voted 6-1 to "form a new workgroup to come up with some options and further recommendations to the Board of Health" regarding the structure of the BOH. Councilmembers and PHAB members were appointed to the new work group. A second work group was formed to begin drafting changes to county code, to reach out to city elected officials and tribes, and to propose specific options to County Council.

Next steps include a legal review to align county code with state law, continue to engage cities, tribes, and community members, and to present an ordinance with code changes to County Council in 2025.
